To learn in depth the complexity of this group of migrant mothers, we must delve into the personal history of each of these women. Not only be taken into account are the different stages of migration, the variables related to children left in origin, but to be collected (for part of a qualified professional with at least an ethnocentric possible) all the personal psychological characteristics (ways of coping, beliefs, etc.), family (agreements / disagreements, support, change of roles in couples or with respect to the family of origin), socioeconomic factors (housing, administrative regularity, remittances), cultural (support network, cultural clash, etc.), which makes every woman in this group in a unique case and a specific approach.
